Home Equity Lending

Home equity loans in Texas are limited by several constitutional provisions. Among the many unique Texas home equity lending provisions are: a maximum 80% aggregate loan-to-value ratio, 3% limit on loan-related fees, prohibition against taking additional personal collateral to secure the loan, and a restriction against a borrower refinancing the loan more than once each year. The law also requires lenders to provide specific disclosures to the borrower, and includes significant penalties for noncompliance. Based on the unique nature of the Texas home equity lending law, credit unions are encouraged to have their loan forms and related documents reviewed by legal counsel to ensure they fully comply with the constitutional requirements.
